Finders Keepers

It was the middle of the day on a bright sunny Saturday, and Jay and his friends Mike and Tony were riding their dirt bikes on one of their favorite off-road trails. They usually didn't ride early in the day or in the evening because hikers and runners liked the trail too, but the hikers and runners generally used the trail in the mornings and evenings.

The trail twisted and turned through some incredible foliage. Occasionally Jay and his friends would stop to climb a tree and find a comfortable branch to sit on so they could take a break from riding in the heat. They also like to observe the newer bikers as they rode over of the unpredictable bumps on the trail and wiped out. Jay, Mike and Tony did have their mischievous sides.

On this particular day, Jay and the boys were perched in one of their preferred trees when Jay spotted something shiny on the ground. "What do you think that could be?" he asked Mike and Tony as he pointed out the object reflecting the sun.

They all hopped down from their individual branches and went to take a closer look. What they found was incomprehensible to them. It was a gold money clip holding five hundred dollars.

Mike immediately exclaimed, "Awesome! We can split up the money, and we will each be much closer to being able to buy the new bikes we want.

"Not so fast," said Tony. "Jay was the one who spotted the cash. To be fair, he should get more than us. He should get three hundred dollars, and we should each get one hundred dollars.

"What are you guys, crazy?" asked Jay. "We can't keep the money. It isn't ours. Aren't we more mature than to play finders keepers like we did when we were kids?"

"Stop being such an advocate for honesty," groaned Mike and Tony.

"Whoever lost the money wasn't very responsible and should learn a lesson about walking around with that much cash on them anyhow," added Mike.

"Let's all go home and think about this," said Jay, knowing that he could have made the call because he was the one who spotted the money clip in the first place.

Mike and Tony agreed to Jay's suggestion. Jay kept the money, and they all rode their bikes home. They decided to meet up after dinner at the head of the off-road trail.

Mike and Tony lived on the same street so they rode home most of the way together. They were able to talk a bit more without Jay's input. The more they talked, they came to see Jay's point. They also thought about how upset they would be if they accidentally dropped and lost something that was important to them.

When Jay, Mike and Tony met back up after dinner, Mike and Tony conceded that Jay was right. They all rode their bikes to the police station together to turn in the money clip and its holdings. The police officer who took the report about the found money clip told them that he was impressed with their honesty. He also said that if no one claimed the lost item, it would rightfully be theirs. He took Jay's phone number just in case.

Jay left knowing he did the right thing. Mike and Tony even felt better about the situation.

The next morning, a man called the police station to report his lost money clip. When he found out it had been turned in, he was thrilled. He asked who turned it in and learned about Jay and his friends.

Shortly thereafter, Jay received a phone call asking him to go to the police station. He was a bit nervous, but when he got there, he learned that the money clip had been claimed, and the owner wanted to reward the individuals who turned it in.

When Jay got to the station, the police officer handed him a gift certificate from the local bicycle shop for one hundred dollars.

Jay met up with Mike and Tony later that day and told them what happened. Mike and Tony thought about their initial reactions to the find and realized that it is far better to not be a keeper. Neither of them had even thought that there would be a reward, so it was it was a happy ending for all involved.
